The Franklin Repository, April 6, 1868.

The Presidential Structure

The campaign of 1868 opened with the Republican party divided into three camps: the New Hampshire, and there must be a division of the two great parties in the Northern and Southern States. The Democratic party, on the other hand, is well organized and strong. The Republicans have, however, a majority of the states and will probably be able to vote their entire strength. The Democratic party, on the other hand, has been organized in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.

There is a great deal of excitement in the Northern and Southern States. The Democrats have been组织ed in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.

The New Hampshire campaign is under the leadership of the Democratic party, and is characterized by a general reluctance to accept the result of the election. The Democrats have been organized in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.

The New Hampshire campaign is under the leadership of the Democratic party, and is characterized by a general reluctance to accept the result of the election. The Democrats have been organized in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.

The New Hampshire campaign is under the leadership of the Democratic party, and is characterized by a general reluctance to accept the result of the election. The Democrats have been organized in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.

The New Hampshire campaign is under the leadership of the Democratic party, and is characterized by a general reluctance to accept the result of the election. The Democrats have been organized in the Southern States, and there is a large majority of the states in the South which will probably vote for the candidates of that party.