Lincoln's New Cabinet.

Reconstruction and Its Consequences.

The President has just received the following dispatch from Gen. Schofield: "The military government established in the District of Columbia has been dissolved and the troops withdrawn." This is a great and welcome event. The President has long been advocating the establishment of civil government in that section, and the appointment of a civil governor and a civil legislature. The military government has been a burden and an annoyance to the people, and has been a hindrance to the progress of the country. The President is now proceeding to Washington to take charge of the affairs of the government, and to arrange for the election of a civil governor and a civil legislature. The people are now looking forward to a brighter and happier future, and to the establishment of a just and equitable government.
