As the Lee had bid adieu to the war, so did General G. T. Beauregard, who was present among local and national leaders who gathered in Richmond to attend the grand military review and farewell to the soldiers of the Confederate States of America.

The great event of the day was the review of the Confederate troops, commanded by General Beauregard. The reviewing stand was in the city, and the line of troops extended for miles. The soldiers were in their best uniforms, and the whole city was alive with excitement. The sun was shining brightly, and the air was filled with the sound of music and cheering.

The review opened with a grand parade of the Confederate army, followed by a military pageant, which was a magnificent sight. The review lasted several hours, and the soldiers displayed their skill and precision in military exercises.

Among the attendees were President of the Confederate States, Jefferson Davis, and General Robert E. Lee, who had just resigned his command. The event was a farewell to the soldiers of the Confederacy, and it was a moving occasion for all who were present.

After the review, the soldiers were dismissed, and a military band played the national anthem as the troops marched back to their camps. The day was a fitting farewell to the Confederate army, and it marked the end of a long and bloody war.
