The White Whale of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. H. L. T, of Carrieville, Canada, has been publishing two accounts of the capture of a great whale in the St. Lawrence and the most marvelous event in the history of the sea.

In one of these accounts, he has detailed the capture of a white whale, which was first seen by a group of fishermen who were returning from a long voyage. The whale was first spotted near the Cape Breton Islands, and was followed by the fishermen for several days. The whale continued to swim slowly, and was finally seen by a large group of men who were hunting the whale. The men were amazed at the size of the whale, which was estimated to be over 100 feet long. The whales were hunted for their meat and oil, which were used for cooking and lighting.

The fishermen were able to capture the whale with the help of a large harpoon, which was used to drive the whale towards the shore. The whale was then killed and cut into smaller pieces, which were then sold for food.

Another account of the capture of a white whale was published by Mr. T., who claimed to have been present at the scene of the capture. He said that the whale was seen near the mouth of the St. Lawrence River, and was followed by a group of men who were hunting the whale. The men were able to capture the whale with the help of a large harpoon, which was used to drive the whale towards the shore. The whale was then killed and cut into smaller pieces, which were then sold for food.

The fishermen were able to sell the whale meat for a high price, and were able to earn a lot of money. The whale oil was also sold for a high price, and was used for cooking and lighting.

The whale was estimated to be over 100 feet long, and was the largest whale ever seen in the St. Lawrence. The whale was estimated to weigh over 100 tons, and was estimated to be over 100 years old.

The whale was captured on May 2, 1860, and was killed on May 5, 1860. The whale was cut into smaller pieces, which were then sold for food. The whale oil was also sold for a high price, and was used for cooking and lighting.
