CONVERT TO REPUBLICANS

The President announced his intention of converting the Republican party to the support of the Union. His speech was received with great enthusiasm, and many of his friends rejoiced over the great change which he had made.

On the other hand, there were many who were not satisfied with the President's action. They believed that he had gone too far in his efforts to conciliate the South, and that he was not doing enough to protect the interests of the North.

The Republican party was divided on this question. Some of its members were in favor of the President's course, while others were opposed.

The question was hotly contested, and many arguments were advanced on both sides. In the end, however, the President was able to carry the day, and the Republican party was converted to the support of the Union.

The President's action was widely applauded, and many people hailed it as a great step forward. The Union was saved, and the country was united once more.

The President's success in converting the Republican party to the support of the Union was a great victory for the Union cause, and it helped to ensure its ultimate success.
