THE BATTLE AT BELMONT.

It is stated in this city this morning that the Federal army has captured the Confederate stronghold of Belmont, Mo. The Federal troops have been at Belmont for several days, and the work of capture is said to be nearly completed. The Confederate garrison is reported to be about 2,000 strong, and the Federals are said to have captured the town without much opposition.

The Federal forces, it is said, have already taken possession of the stronghold and are now in the process of destroying the Confederate fortifications. The Confederate commander, General Price, is said to have fled to the interior of Missouri, leaving his troops to surrender to the Federals.

It is believed that the capture of Belmont will strengthen the Union cause in the West and will encourage the Union forces to continue their advance. The Confederate stronghold, which was captured by Federal troops in 1861, was a key position in the Union defense of the Missouri River.

The Federal forces, led by General Ulysses S. Grant, have been in the area for several days, and their capture of Belmont is seen as a major victory for the Union.

THE NAVY-FRONT FROM BUNACAY.

The navy fleet from Bunacay has been reported as having arrived in the vicinity of Port Royal. The fleet is said to be under the command of Rear Admiral David D. Porter. The fleet's arrival is seen as a significant event in the ongoing conflict.

The navy fleet is expected to play a key role in the upcoming battle, and its arrival is seen as a major boost to the Union cause. The fleet's presence is likely to deter Confederate forces from attempting to take Port Royal.

The fleet's arrival is also expected to bolster the Union's efforts to secure the key port, which is critical to the Union's supply lines. The fleet's presence is likely to make it more difficult for the Confederates to attack Port Royal.

THE FUTURE STILL BLEAKER.

The future for the Confederates still looks bleak. Despite the capture of Belmont, the Union forces continue to advance in the area. The Confederate forces are facing a difficult situation, with their supply lines threatened and their position in the area under threat.

The Confederate forces are expected to continue their retreat from the area, with the Union forces likely to follow up their victory with further advances. The Confederates are likely to face a difficult time as they attempt to regroup and defend their position in the area.

The battle at Belmont is seen as a major victory for the Union, and the navy fleet's arrival is expected to strengthen their position. The Union forces are likely to continue their advance, with the Confederate forces facing a difficult situation as they attempt to defend their position in the area.

VALLEY SPIRIT.

By the pleasure of some friends of the Southern States, a small military regiment was organized, which was called the "Valley Spirit." The regiment consisted of 100 men, and was raised in the counties of Augusta, Richmond, and Hanover.

The Regiment.

The men were not long in training, and were soon ready for service. They were well drilled, and were able to move with great precision. Their officers were strict, but fair, and the men respected them.

The Battle.

On the morning of the battle, the regiment was ordered to advance. They marched forward with great determination, and reached the battlefield in good order. The enemy was陣前, and the regiment was in good position to attack.

The Result.

The battle was fought with great bravery on both sides. The Southern forces were victorious, and the regiment emerged from the battle with honor.

INFORMATION FROM THE SHELTER.

A dispatch was sent to the shelter, stating that the regiment had been victorious, and that the news would be sent to the city immediately.

The City.

The news reached the city, and was greeted with joy and celebration. The people were happy to know that their men had emerged from the battle with honor.

The Regiment Returns.

The regiment returned to the city, and was received with great enthusiasm. The people were proud of their men, and the regiment was hailed as heroes.

The Conclusion.

The regiment was disbanded, and the men returned to their homes. They were happy to be reunited with their families, and to have served their country.

END.
