The debate which recently occurred in the House of Representatives on the question of the annexation of the Oregon country was one of the most important of the session. It was conducted with great ability and with a large amount of learning and information, and is a subject of great interest to all who are interested in the future of that country.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Webster delivered a speech in which he advocated the policy of the United States in regard to the Oregon country, and particularly the annexation of that territory. He stated that the United States had a just claim to the entire territory west of the Rocky Mountains, and that it was the duty of the government to secure that territory for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. Webster's speech was received with great applause, and was followed by a number of other speeches on both sides of the question. The debate continued for several days, and was noted for its clear and concise arguments on both sides.

The result of the debate was that the annexation of the Oregon country was not adopted by the House of Representatives. However, the question was not abandoned, and it was left to the Senate to consider the matter further.

The President subsequently issued a message to Congress, in which he expressed his views on the subject of the annexation of the Oregon country. He stated that the United States had a just claim to the entire territory west of the Rocky Mountains, and that it was the duty of the government to secure that territory for the benefit of the American people.

The President's message was followed by a number of speeches on both sides of the question. The debate continued for several days, and was noted for its clear and concise arguments on both sides.

The result of the debate was that the annexation of the Oregon country was not adopted by the Senate. However, the question was not abandoned, and it was left to the House of Representatives to consider the matter further.