Miscellaneous. THE SOFT ANSWER.

BY T. S. ANTHONY. 'I'll give him law to his heart's content, the seconded' said Mr. Singleton, walking backward and forward...

'Every man should be known by his true name. Williams is a sounder, and so he ought to be called' responded the stout, wiry man...

'I can't say I ever did, Mr. Trueman. But now, I have good reason for being angry, and the language I use in reference to Williams is but the expression of a sober and rational conviction...'

'No! I did not. But the letter confirmed my previously formed impressions of his character.' 'That I cannot find in that letter any evidence proving your late partner to be a dishonest man...'

'There you are decidedly wrong, said the lawyer. 'You have both allowed yourselves to become angry, and both unreasonable, and if I must speak plainly, I think you are most unreasonable in the present case.'

'I have written the letter, and I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner.'

'I have written the letter, and I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner.'

'I have written the letter, and I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner. I have written it in a very proper manner.'

OR, THE DISGUISED DUKE. CHAPTER I.

My story opens in the classic precincts of Bowling Green, the point of an aristocratic mansion of Bacon street...

Presently she pressed her hand to her breast, and started up in a cool manner. 'Methinks,' she whispers in elation tones, 'I see a voice!'

'Of course I did.' 'The letter which I had just received from you, states, New, as I am sure, willing to grant to him the same privilege which you asked for yourself...'

'I can't say I ever did, Mr. Trueman. But now, I have good reason for being angry, and the language I use in reference to Williams is but the expression of a sober and rational conviction...'

'No! I did not. But the letter confirmed my previously formed impressions of his character.' 'That I cannot find in that letter any evidence proving your late partner to be a dishonest man...'

'There you are decidedly wrong, said the lawyer. 'You have both allowed yourselves to become angry, and both unreasonable, and if I must speak plainly, I think you are most unreasonable in the present case.'
